

Mukilteo

Mukilteo, WA

Multimodal Ferry Terminal

“We have been here, we are here, and we will always be here.”

This is the powerful testimonial statement from the Coast Salish tribes that inspired the design of the new Mukilteo Multimodal Ferry Terminal. The project provides a central gathering point for transportation, recreation, and significant cultural expression. The location has historical importance, sited near where many Coast Salish tribes signed the Point Elliott Treaty in 1855. The design was coordinated with 11 Coast Salish tribes and building forms, materials, planting and art reflect the tribe’s values. Site design includes plant identification signs to provide interpretive information on ethnobotanic plants in the indigenous Lushootseed language. The project weaves many narratives together, to form a site design of connected networks of transportation and cultures. The design strives to provide an equitable, diverse, and inclusive site that recognizes the past, and honors the present and continued legacy of the Coast Salish Tribes in Puget Sound. We acknowledge that justice may never be complete.

HBB Landscape Architecture
 LMN Architects
 KPFF Consulting Engineers
 Jacobs
 CM Design Group
 Dark Light Design

All images © Meghan Montgomery